

The FCC has taken such an aggressive stance towards "indecent" broadcast recently, that it is difficult to find programming that is of an adult intellectual level. When local TV stations fear FCC retribution for airing Saving Private Ryan, it is clear that the FCC's actions are having a chilling effect on the free expression of serious topics. Digital broadcasting can remain an adult arena without government censorship, if the FCC will only keep its hands off programming content. The vocal minority that seems to have a disproportionate voice when it is offended by ANYTHING, can exercise restraint by not listening and/or viewing programming intended for an adult audience. I encourage the FCC to exercise restraint and allow an adult medium to exist free of government interference. Many, many Americans like myself do not need the FCC to determine what is fit for me and my child to watch when we can do that job perfectly well on our own. I do not need to be "protected".
